Easier than the previous games in the series, which makes it less frustrating, but also less interesting. The level design is generally good; some levels drag a bit, and the paths through tunnels could be more clearly marked, but I like the amount of freedom you have in what to build where.

Widescreen is implemented awkwardly; if you click past the boundaries of where a 4:3 monitor would cut off, the edges of the screen flash red and a "locked" notification pops up. It's ugly, and it's hard to tell at a glance which trees are inside the boundary and clickable and which are not without hovering your mouse over everything. A minor annoyance, although I do appreciate that the developers wanted to make sure the game didn't break on non-widescreen monitors.

Anyway, this is a solid time management game, if not a particularly memorable one, and fans of the genre should enjoy it.. Great game for everyday relax. But too short.
